Bond Street Theatre Awarded Global Connections Grant from TCG to Continue Theatre Development in Myanmar

NEW YORK, NY - Jun. 27, 2016 - Bond Street Theatre is the recipient of a Global Connections IN THE LAB grant from the Theatre Communications Group (TCG), one of only four awarded nationally. The $10,000 grant will allow Bond Street to continue its collaboration with Thukhuma Khayeethe (Art Travelers) in Myanmar, including the public premiere of their dual-language adaptation of Ben Jonson's 1605 play Volpone, retitled Volpone-Yangon, an east-west fusion of styles and characters that addresses the volatile social-political situation in Myanmar.

Bond Street Theatre and Thukhuma Khayeethe, a pioneer contemporary theatre group, have been collaborating since 2009 in support of local theatre artists who are creating purposeful work in a tumultuous social and political landscape. The two groups began work on Volpone-Yangon in 2012, but have been unable to stage public performances due to potential political ramifications.

Since 1962, Myanmar has endured a military regime that allowed little room for creativity or self-expression. Burmese artists have long been isolated from new theatrical ideas in the world. While new reforms promise a more open future, Burmese artists struggle to reflect the changing political reality and still experience censorship.

"There is some hope of change but, on the local level, authorities are reluctant to accept it, so we are still cautious," said Thukhuma Khayeethe Director Thila Min.

Volpone-Yangon warns against the political abuses that come with economic change as Myanmar opens itself to the world, tying together similar archetypes of political hierarchies across cultures. The play combines innovative, contemporary theatre techniques with Burmese traditions, including a 'nat pwe,' a traditional Burmese dance to the spirits.

"This is something very new and interesting. We need this in Myanmar," said Professor Ye Mon of Yangon University.

The aim of the program is to foster peer-to-peer sharing between Burmese and Western theatre artists and traditions, and allow the collaboration to promote social awareness to a new audience while vitalizing contemporary theatre in Myanmar.

"Artists pave the way for progress through the powerful voice of theatre. Thukhuma Khayeethe and Bond Street are both eager to share theatrical traditions and discover a new cultural marriage of styles," said Joanna Sherman, Artistic Director of Bond Street Theatre.

Volpone-Yangon will be performed in Yangon and Mandalay.

Bond Street Theatre has been initiating international arts-based projects for conflict resolution, empowerment, and education since 1984 and has been working in Myanmar since 2009. The company uses theatre as a means of promoting peace, communicating across cultures, and uplifting populations disadvantaged by war or oppression. BST collaborates with local artists to reap the benefits of artistic exchange and promotes the value of the arts in shaping a peaceful future.
